The Wedge-tailed Eagle is one of the most impressive and better-studied of Australia's birds so it somewhat surprising that there has been no previous attempt to summarise what is known in a dedicated book, although the eagle has not been without its scribes, particularly for a young audience. This book draws on the hard work of several people including Michael Brooker, Nick Mooney, Stephen Debus and Bill Brown, and discussions with eagle enthusiasts such as Nicky Birks, Tony Ross and Robert Bartos. To them and others over the years who have shared their ideas about eagles, I owe much.

I am especially grateful to Michael, Nick, Michael, Stephen and Bill for reviewing the draft and generously contributing some of their own observations. Terry Dennis provided the estimate of eagle numbers on Kangaroo Island. Thanks also to others, evident in the reference list, with the energy to observe, study and communicate their understanding of eagles.

Volume 2 of the Handbook of Australian New Zealand and Antarctic Birds and the Raptor Information Centre's bibliographic database—<http://ris.wr.usgs.gov/>—made compiling the bibliography relatively painless. Stephen also sent me his bibliography of Australasian eagle species, which yielded some overlooked references, and his careful editorial eye picked up several silly errors.

This would be a very dull book indeed without the marvellous images that bring the mighty eagle to life. Australia is fortunate to have so many talented artists and photographers of the natural world, and I am fortunate that two in particular were willing to contribute to this modest book. Peter Merritt's luminous photographs go beyond mere technical excellence, and Humphrey Price-Jones' beautifully drafted illustrations show his depth of knowledge of the bird.

There are other photographers to thank. Greg Holland provided the evocative cover photo and, with Leon Keasey at www.birdphotos.com.au, has always responded with great generosity to requests for photos for Wingspan, the membership magazine of Birds Australia, which I edit. David Whelan supplied the silhouettes on the back page, taken as part of his quest to alert authorities that Yaloak Vale—then, but happily no longer, mooted for development as a windfarm—was heavily populated with eagles at great risk of collision with the turbines. The Australian National Wildlife Collection, CSIRO Sustainable Ecosystems, kindly allowed use of a slide of the Port Jackson Painter painting, taken by Ederic Slater many years ago at the British
